Daisy Stevens Rojas grew up in Albemarle County and graduated from Albemarle High School. In the early 2000s as a single mom, Daisy enrolled her children in Albemarle County Bright Stars, at then Agnor Hurt Elementary School. She and her children received counseling from CYFS (now Ready Kids). Some of her groceries came from the Blue Ridge Area Food Bank and Loaves and Fishes. She felt supported by the community of Charlottesville and the programs and services that were necessary to help her start over.

Over the next nine years, Daisy worked two jobs, got married, and had her third and fourth child. During this period she graduated from PVCC, started a business with her husband, and then went on to get two degrees from the University of Virginia. A double major in Anthropology and Latin American Studies led her to publish research articles on minority group experiences, education, business, health and financial topics.

While raising 4 children who all attended ACPS schools, she helped her husband grow his business into a multi-stat firm. Then in 2013, Daisy and her husband Geiner Rojas won the Chuck Lewis Passion Award, an honor that goes to local entrepreneurs who overcome adversity and contribute to the Charlottesville-area economy.

Later in grad school, Daisy was chosen for a leadership seminar with President Emeritus John Casteen. From which she also published her research related to education finance.

Since her early years, Daisy has been involved in education and community development. Her efforts have garnered more than $20 million in funds while she served in various roles as Associate Director at The Covenant School, development officer at the UVA Office of Development, research consultant for the Darden School of Business, researcher for the Curry School of Education and Director for United Way before opening her own practice as an Investment Advisor.

Professionally she is credited as an expert in her areas of knowledge with several published articles which may be accessed here: <https://virginia.academia.edu/DaisyRojas>
